Domestic Violence Awareness Month

Signs of domestic violence

Domestic violence is a problem that can affect anyone at anytime. Considering victims are usually frightened of their abusers, they often suffer in silence.

The Domestic Violence Resource Center says that 1 in 4 women has experienced domestic violence in her lifetime. Estimates range from 960,000 incidents of violence against a current or former spouse, boyfriend, or girlfriend to 3 million women who are physically abused by their husbands or boyfriends per year. Men can also be victims of domestic violence at the hands of their female partners, and abuse can occur between same-sex couples as well. However, the Bureau of Justice Statistics indicates that women ages 20-24 are at the greatest risk of nonfatal intimate partner violence.

Domestic violence comes in many forms, including physical, emotional and verbal abuse. Many victims of domestic violence are battered into secrecy or are embarrassed that they are being abused and do not share their experiences with others. Others might not even realize what they are experiencing constitutes abuse. But there are some signs of domestic violence that can be observed and a third party may be able to intervene.

- A partner who harbors unrealistic expectations. Experts say that those who engage in domestic violence are generally perfectionists and expect those around them to reach unattainable goals and their own perfection. Violence may result when things do not go off without a hitch.

- A partner who is controlling. When a person insists you account for all of your time, the relationship may eventually turn abusive. This behavior generally stems from feelings of insecurity and poor self-esteem on the part of the abusive individual, which is then projected on the partner in terms of abusive words or distrust.

- Escalating threats: In many cases, domestic violence begins with verbal assaults which may develop into physical threats. Whether the abuse is verbal or physical, it can have profound and long-lasting effects on the victim. For those who observe a person continually brow-beating a spouse or talking badly about him or her, this may be an indication of an abusive relationship.

- A partner with a noticeable temper. Sometimes a temper goes hand-in-hand with domestic violence. An individual with a short fuse and a propensity for lashing out with minimal patience in areas outside of his or her relationship may be equally short-fused in the relationship.

- A partner who limits access to money, belongings or the car. You may notice your friend or a family member continually having to ask permission to use the car or visit with people. Some friends complain about not having access to the checkbook or being kept on a strict budget. While not always a case of domestic violence, it may be a warning sign that something is not right.

- Hidden bruises or excuses for injuries: Michigan State University's Safe Place indicates that injuries that are covered up and happen with some frequency could be an early warning sign of domestic violence. If you know someone who is trying to downplay frequent injuries, it may be a red flag.

- Conflict avoidance: Usually those who are in abusive relationships try to avoid conflict and rarely speak up or voice their own opinions.

- Personality changes: Withdrawal, inability or not wanting to meet up with friends, loss of enthusiasm, or any other personality changes may be indicative of abuse.

Domestic violence is something that takes many forms and is often hidden. But there may be some warning signs that can be observed through an outside party.

DID YOU KNOW?

Domestic violence is a complex issue. The U.S. National Library of Medicine indicates family and domestic violence is a common problem, affecting an estimated 10 million people every year in the United States. Domestic violence affects as many as one in four women and one in nine men. Although domestic violence can be perpetrated by anyone, men are more likely to be the perpetrators of physical violence in intimate partner relationships. Women's Aid, an information and support organization in the United Kingdom, says women experience higher rates of repeated victimization and are much more likely to be seriously hurt during episodes of domestic violence. However, other studies indicate that men and women can be perpetrators at similar rates, and that women may be more likely to be the perpetrators in relationships with mutual violence. Lumen Learning says low socioeconomic status, poverty and unemployment are frequently cited as risk factors for domestic violence. Also, those who have a history of abuse, whether as children or adults, tend to be more likely to perpetrate domestic violence crimes themselves.
